There are stories that inform us... and there are stories that transform us.
The Eternal Song is both.

Filmed across Indigenous lands from the Arctic to the Amazon, this new documentary carries stories of communities around the world healing from the trauma of colonization and ecological destruction. A thread of memory and prayer weaves through 13 Indigenous communities, each carrying their own ancestral songs of grief, resilience, and belonging.

In a time of great unraveling, The Eternal Song is an invitation to remember what lives beneath the noise; to listen deeply; to gather in reverence for the Earth and for each other.

“This is not just a film to be watched. It’s a field to enter. A song to remember.”
— Zaya & Maurizio Benazzo, directors of The Eternal Song

The Backstory: After the release of The Wisdom of Trauma, which was seen by over 10 million people from 230 countries and territories, filmmakers Zaya and Maurizio were guided by a deeper question: What about the trauma carried not just in the body, but in the land, in language, in ancestral memory?

Their search became a journey. A whisper turned into a gathering, and The Eternal Song was born—not as a project, but as a sacred offering woven by Indigenous communities across the world.

The Eternal Song is a remembering: of Earth; of grief; of beauty; of the song that never stopped singing beneath our forgetfulness.

This new film, from the creators of The Wisdom of Trauma, takes us on a sacred journey through 13 Indigenous communities—from the Arctic to the Amazon.

These are not just stories. They are living prayers, spoken in the language of land, spirit, and song.
